Enid Blyton , 1897 - 1968 (Author)

Enid Mary Blyton trained as a teacher and worked as a teacher and governess before becoming a professional children's author following the publication of a collection of poems, Child Whispers, in 1922. She published extensively, with an output estimated at between 600-700 books and stories. For the first fifteen years these stories were largely versions of traditional myths and other familiar stories, while more original stories followed. Even the original stories were often heavily influenced by myth. The Enchanted Wood (1939), for example, was heavily influenced by Norse myth. Many of Blyton's stories focused on children's adventure. This included her most famous series, the Famous Five, which began appearing in the 1940s and ran to over twenty titles. The Secret Seven series also focused on mystery adventure stories with child protagonists. Blyton is also well-known for her school series, The Naughtiest Girl, Malory Towers, and St. Clare's, and for her stories for younger children centred on the character, Noddy.

There has been criticism of Blyton's work, focused largely upon their limited vocabulary and upon their use of racist and sexist stereotypes. The books remain popular, however; frequently reissued and, particularly Noddy and the Famous Five, adapted for television.

Chris Price (Illustrator)

Little conclusive material can be found about Chris Price, who was perhaps an in-house illustrator for the publisher. The British Library Catalogue ascribes Tales of Ancient Greece to the illustrator Christine Price; however, since her dates are given as 1928 – 1980 (meaning she was born two years before this book's publication), either the birth date or assignment are presumably incorrect. Christine Price illustrated certain works of Henry Treece and is the creator of the Made In book series, which includes Made in Ancient Greece (1967) and Made in Ancient Egypt (1970). The copyright to Price's illustrations was renewed on the 1998 edition in 1998; this copyright renewal does not appear for Blyton.

Additional information

Summary

This is a short collection of Greek myths retold for children. They are related in fairly simple language, mostly adapted closely from Ovid's Metamorphoses. The illustrations take the form of black and white line drawings depicting key moments in the chapters.

- Pandora and the Whispering Box.
- Phaeton and the Sun-Horses.
- Proserpina and the King of the Underworld.
- The Maiden of the Laurel Tree (Daphne and Apollo)
- The Watchman with a Hundred Eyes (Io and Argus).
- The Story of Echo and Narcissus.
- The King with the Golden Touch (Midas).
- The Story of Orpheus and Eurydice.
- Clytie, the Sunflower Maiden.
- The Story of Baucis and Philemon.
- The Statue that Came to Life (Pygmalion and Galatea).
- The Story of Hyacinthus.
- The Story of Cupid and Psyche.
- The Wings of Icarus.
- The Boastful Spinner (Arachne).
- Arion and the Dolphin.

Analysis

This anthology is a somewhat early work by immensely successful children's author Enid Blyton, published during the 1930s period in which she focused on myth and folklore. In contrast to popular 1920s myth anthologies, which adapted myth loosely (e.g. Winder 1923; Price 1924; Crawford and Crawford 1929), this book sticks closer to the stories found in Ovid's Metamorphoses. We can thus see the beginnings of the move to the focus on perceived "accuracy" to ancient myth in the mid-twentieth century, found in the anthologies of e.g. Hamilton 1942; Warner 1950 and Coolidge 1949.

Whilst Blyton does not explicitly turn adult mythical characters into children as, for example, Nathaniel Hawthorne does (A Wonder Book for Girls and Boys 1851), she consistently shows adult characters behaving in a childlike way. Presumably, this is to make them more relatable to the audience. For example, Psyche runs around in Cupid's garden playing with the flowers and birds. Pandora and Epimetheus are always outside dancing, and when Pandora is absorbed with the box Epimetheus begs her "to come and play with him" (p. 3). Whilst they are described as married and Pandora is depicted as an adult in the illustrations, Pandora is also called a "maiden", which sometimes means virgin. This adapting of characters as childlike is quite common for anthologies of this period (e.g. Daphne as child in Crawford and Crawford 1929), but would become less popular in the mid-twentieth century works.

The Pandora retelling also arguably draws on the Garden of Eden, or perhaps ideas of a lost "primitive golden age". We may be meant to interpret this as an Edenic world without sexuality until the release of the sorrows. Pandora and Epimetheus start out at one with nature, living in a house of branches and leaves. The story also shows the ideas of white as good and anything else as bad for which Blyton is controversial. The sorrows that come from the box are always called "the brown-winged creatures", whilst Hope, when she emerges, is "not a brown-winged creature, but a little snowy-winged spirit" who heals people by "brushing the wounds on their skin with her snowy wings" (p. 7).

Mythical stories of adultery are somewhat obscured, but there are hints for those in the know. For example, Jupiter admires Io very much and comes to earth to visit her, but is afraid Juno will be jealous. He thus hides in a cloud "so that she might not see him talking to Io" (p. 31). After Io is taken prisoner by Hera, Jupiter does not seem upset she is a prisoner so much as that she is no longer beautiful. "He could not bear to think that the lovely nymph was a heifer, and he longed to change her back to her own form." (p. 34). This suggests at the uncensored mythical version, some of Jupiter's assumed gallantry from the opening disappearing.

Adultery is again obscured in the Echo and Narcissus retelling. Echo, rather than distracting Juno with her talk so Juno will not discover Jupiter with nymphs, simply talks too much to Juno, is "rebuked" and "answered the goddess rudely" (p. 37), for which she is punished. Narcissus in this version is called "vain" but comes across more as socially insecure. He thinks that when Echo repeats his lines back to him, she is mocking him. He thus angrily tells her she is pretending to love him, and "your friends are behind the trees, laughing" (p. 39). After this, Echo's curse that he will "love in vain, and know what pain it was" (p. 39) seems rather cruel. The narrative acknowledges this at the end, having Echo eventually regret her wish when she sees Narcissus suffering, and grieve that her own curse makes her unable to warn him.

The didactic message that money does not bring happiness in the Midas retelling is particularly pronounced. The final sentence is: "Thus was Midas cured of his greed for gold, and learnt that riches do not bring a man happiness or peace." (p. 49). This message is also emphasised throughout the Baucis and Philemon retelling. Here it is additionally implied that wealth, power and beauty are (wrongly) the goals of most people. When Jupiter offers the couple a wish after seeing that they are good, he expects them to ask for a palace, wealth or youth, and is much surprised when they ask to die at the same time.

Jupiter's assumption about what the couple will ask for does not appear in most other retellings, and it is therefore interesting he assumes they will ask for wealth and power at the highest level. The possibility they might ask for a level of wealth that would keep them safe from discomfort without putting them at the top of any social hierarchies, which might be viewed as less unreasonable by the child reader, is not considered. The combination of these Midas and Baucis and Philemon myths perhaps promotes something of a conservative mindset. Midas, a rich king, must learn to be content with the (great) amounts of wealth he has and not seek more; learning to avoid materialism does not mean disdaining the wealth he already has, however. Baucis and Philemon, an old peasant couple, are rightly happy with what they have and do not want more. The consistent message is that people should be happy with their own wealth and power, not looking to either increase or decrease it. There is, perhaps, a resulting implication people in real life should also be happy with their born social station.

In the Orpheus retelling, Orpheus turns back to gaze at Eurydice too soon not because he distrusts Pluto but because he wonders whether some of Eurydice's beauty has faded in the Underworld.

Apollo is probably the overall main character of the anthology, and Blyton presents a somewhat unusual view of him. Whilst other children's anthologies emphasise Apollo's beauty in a more feminine way (e.g. Margaret Evans Price A Child's Book of Myths and Enchantment Tales 1924; Geraldine McCaughrean The Orchard Book of Greek Myths 1992; James Baldwin Old Greek Stories 1895), and others emphasise his cultured or musical associations (e.g. The D'Aulaires' Book of Greek Myth 1962; Bernard Evslin Heroes, Gods and Monsters of the Greek Myths 1967; Rick Riordan 2014 Percy Jackson's Greek Gods and the accompanying novels), here Apollo's masculine strength and how beautiful this makes him is the focus when he is described. Clytie fantasises about Apollo's "strength and his beauty" (p. 57). When Apollo pursues Daphne, he is called "fierce and full of love" and "strong and tireless" (p. 28).

For a retelling of this period, the queer elements in the story of Hyacinthus are surprisingly explicit. Hyacinthus "was greatly loved by the god Apollo" and Zephyrus also "loved Hyacinthus, and was jealous because the youth liked Apollo best." (p. 72). Apollo takes the dying Hyacinthus in his arms, and Zephyrus, later regretting what he has caused, caresses the flowers that grow from Hyacinthus' blood "endlessly" (p. 73).

In places there is influence from classical art. For example, in one illustration showing Cupid shooting Daphne with his bow, Daphne appears to be a trace of the goddess Flora from the fresco at the Villa of Ariadne in Stabiae. This is a curious choice, since copying the Flora image means Daphne is now shown picking flowers, even though this is tonally inconsistent with her portrayal in the text as a strong tomboyish huntress.
