Additional information

Origin/Cultural Background/Dating Bayangam is located in the West Region of Cameroon between latitudes 5° 14 'and 5° 19' N and latitudes 10° 14' and 10° 23.8' E. They are part of the Bamileke tribe, precisely from the Nde Division of the West Region. They owe their origins to the Tikar group that migrated from Egypt. The Bayangam clan includes three groups: the Bayangam, Batoufam, and Bandrefam. The people practice Christianity but are still very much attached to their traditional religion. They also have cults, particularly the cult of the dead. Because the dead are considered to be among people, they are worshipped and venerated through their exhumed skulls.

Summary A long time ago, in Bayangam village, there was a plague. Almost everybody was suffering from one mysterious illness or another. Traditional doctors from far and near did all they could to remedy the situation to no avail. One day, one of the young traditional healers of the village was offering sacrifices to the gods of the land and suddenly, he saw his late father's spirit in front of him. The man got frightened but the spirit reassured him that he was his father and that he shouldn't be scared. The spirit of the father then told his son that he had brought good news from the ancestors. He said that the ancestors had heard his prayers and the plea of the people, in relation to a solution to the mysterious illnesses that had invaded the entire population. His father asked him to take a look at the rock on the hill behind them. Then he said: "Not long from now, water will burst out from those rocks and it will become the solution to all the sicknesses and any other problems the villagers have been facing". With this piece of good news, the native doctor thanked his father, ancestors and the gods of the village and quietly went back to his house, and waited patiently for the promised miracle to happen.

Some months later, the chief priest, as usual, was on his way to offer sacrifices to the gods when he noticed a large crowd at the foot of the rock that his father had shown him. When he went closer to feed his eyes, he discovered that the promise made by the ancestors through his father's spirit had been fulfilled. He was amazed when he saw water coming out from the rock. It was at this point that he rallied everybody and revealed what their forefathers had made as a promise and which had been fulfilled. They all entered the water; some drinking, others bathing. Thereafter, they named it shye vak vak meaning "the healing waterfall." Since then, to this day, the Bayangam waterfall is believed to soothe mysterious and incurable illnesses and remains the pride of the Bayangam people.

Analysis

Water has always been regarded in many cultures, religions and myths (particularly creation myths) around the world as a source of rejuvenation, healing and purification, and also destruction and death. That notwithstanding, and for the most part, particularly in many African cultures, water sources are used as sites for healing, cleansing and purification rituals because it is believed the ancestors and gods reside around bodies of water. These bodies of water in which spirits live are thus believed to have miraculous healing powers, curing both physical and spiritual illnesses, and standing as mediators between humans and the gods.

The myth suggests that there is physical and spiritual healing in nature, thus humans just need to identify these areas that provide such healing and protect them.
