Creators

Seymour Kneitel , 1908 - 1964 (Animator)

Seymour Kneitel was a famous American animator and producer. Due to the sudden death of his father, he had to work while still in high school. Kneitel worked after school at Bray Productions, the company responsible for serial animation featuring the character of Colonel Heeza Liar. After graduation, he worked as animator at L. F. Cornwell, and finally for six months at Metro-Golden-Mayer, before joining a newly developing company, successor to Bray Productions - Fleisher Studios - named first Inkwell Studios and "Out of the Inkwell" Studios and run by the Fleischer brothers, Dave and Max. There, he could finally become a proper animator, being in charge of such series as "Betty Boop" or "Popeye the Sailor". Kneitel was married to Ruth Fleisher, daughter of Max Fleisher, the co-founder of Fleisher Studios. Kneitel worked there with interruptions caused by health problems from 1928 to 1942, when Fleisher brothers resigned and Kneitel, Sam Buchwald and Isidore Sparber reorganized the studio and called it Famous Studios, The new studio functioned until 1956, when Paramount Pictures took it over as Paramount Cartoon Studios. Kneitel became its production director. His filmography includes many Popeye short as well as Caspar the Friendly Ghost's shorts. He died of a heart attack in 1964, three years later Paramount closed its Cartoon Studios.

Sequels, Prequels and Spin-offs Previous episode: Bride and Gloom.
Next episode: Fright to the Finish.

Summary The episode starts with Popeye the Sailor trying to convince his four nephews (Popeye, Peepeye, Poopeye and Pupeye) to eat spinach instead of ice cream. As an example of a great spinach-eater he sets Hercules, the children's great ancestor. Popeye starts the story about the great hero as a fairy-tale: "Once upon a time, a long time ago...", taking his nephews to a distant land where Hercules lived (the location is not specified). Hercules looks just like Popeye (he even has a pipe). While riding in his chariot, Hercules sees a bird falling out of a tall tree. To get it back up, he sniffs garlic which gives him the strength to pull the tree down, so the bird can regain its nest. In a sign of gratitude, the bird sends Hercules a kiss.

Popeye says that: "Hercules was awful strong, but very tender". However, nephews get suspicious since the story did not feature spinach – it was garlic which gave the hero strength. Popeye continues with the story, which now is about the feud between Hercules and the Big Bully, who challenges the hero for a strength contest. The Big Bully lifts an elephant to show his power, but Hercules, smelling garlic, lifts both of them. The nephews are again dissatisfied with the story, which still lacks the spinach impact. Popeye declares that this is not the end yet. In the next fight between the Big Bully and Hercules, garlic is not enough – Hercules is thrown to an ancient temple by his opponent, where a Hercules's (so – his own?) statute falls on his head. The Big Bully discovers Hercules's secret (garlic as a source of strength) and throws him again - this time into a field of spinach. The hero eats the plant by accident and discovers that spinach gives him way more strength than garlic ever did. He defeats the Big Bully who now does not stand a chance.

Unfortunately, the story has not been effective - children skipped the end and went out to get more ice cream (from a man looking like the Big Bully from Popeye's story). They left their uncle a note: "Aw that was a bunch of spinach".

Analysis

Classical allusions start with the title of the episode ("Greek Mirthology"), where "mirth" replaces "myth" implying that maybe the cartoon's version of the ancient stories will be nothing more than a funny tale. The way Popeye starts off his story (with the "fairy-tale" opening) suggests the same - this is going to be an untrue or rather unrealistic tale, told just for amusement, not for the moral (here it would be spinach as a healthy and a divine meal).

Naturally, the main classical content in the cartoon is the story of Hercules and his strength. Actually, the strength is the only aspect of the ancient hero that figured in Popeye's tale. No other plot regarding Hercules (such as the Twelve Labours for instance) was alluded to here. The main thread of the cartoon is the conflict between Hercules and the Big Bully. The cartoon's creators drew on the stereotype of Hercules' strength, using Popeye's appearance and other traits such as pride (of his strength) or tenderness (as in the scene with the bird). The only elements taken from the ancient myth of Hercules are his strength, his name and the temple, which appears in the animation for 2 seconds and has no particular significance for the plot. Compared to Disney's full-length animation Hercules (1997) produced forty-three years later, this is basically just a humorous reworking of the mythical tradition of Hercules' superior strength as the predecessor of Popeye's physical spinach induced might. Other, much more complex mythical stories were presented, for example, by Walt Disney in his "Silly Symphonies" series (e.g. King Neptune, Playful Pan).
