Additional information

Summary

This is a collection of short, simple Greek myths for children with bright, colourful illustrations. The text has large, well-spaced font broken up regularly by its large illustrations.

Featured Stories:

- Prometheus,
- Pandora's Box,
- Persephone and Hades,
- Echo and Narcissus,
- Arachne,
- Pygmalion and Galatea,
- King Midas and the Golden Touch,
- Orpheus and Eurydice,
- Jason and the Golden Fleece,
- Daedalus and Icarus,
- Theseus and the Minotaur,
- Perseus and Medusa.

Analysis

The anthology begins with an introduction by Kimmel, which asks what Greek myths can 'possibly have to say to children who live in a world of cell phones, the Internet, iPods and DVDs?' (p. xi). Kimmel answers by listing the reasons: Myths are 'wonderful stories', they are about 'basic themes in the movies we see and the books we read today' and they 'contain the hopes and dreams of humanity.' Kimmel even claims 'There is a clear connection between Icarus's wings and Neil Armstrong's walk on the moon.' (p. xi).

This book is probably intended for fairly young children, with its large text, bright, colourful illustrations often featuring smiling figures, and tendency to change details so the characters behave in kinder ways. For example, Pandora is created because Epimetheus is lonely without Prometheus, not as a punishment. Pandora opens the box because the creatures trapped inside pretend to beg her for help, and she cannot resist because the gods gave her the gifts of 'kindness and compassion' (p. 10). Epimetheus comforts Pandora and says it was not her fault and he should have told her what was in the box. Epimetheus' kindness to Pandora in particular is a contrast to other anthology retellings; for example Forbush's 1928 children's myth anthology Myths and Legends of Greece and Rome where Forbush adds the detail that Prometheus and Epimetheus want to kill Pandora in retaliation for opening the box but eventually relent.

On the other hand, Kimmel includes a curious grisly detail that the earth is formed from the bodies of dead defeated Titans, reminiscent of the Ymir myth in Norse mythology. This is not, therefore, an anthology entirely without violent or gory moments.

In this version, Persephone falls in love with Hades after he abducts her and thus does not wish to leave. This is a common adaptational choice in recent anthologies, possibly to make this myth less disturbing (e.g. McCaughrean 1992 The Orchard Book of Greek Myths; Milbourne and Stowell 2010 Usborne Book of Myths and Legends; Brack, Sweeney and Thomas 2014 Brick Greek Myths).

In the illustration, where Hades and Demeter argue and Persephone sits beside Hades, he looms large and red above her, looking almost demonic. His arms are wrapped around her and she smiles, looking young and almost childish. Possibly Persephone's youthful appearance is meant to invite identification from the child reader.

The Midas retelling is partly about the importance of using one's resources to help others and do charity. This is a contrast to more conservative children's versions in which the message seems to be about being content with existing social station and resources.*

In Kimmel, Dionysus tells Midas at the start of the story that he should consider using his money to help the poor, something Midas scornfully rejects. Later, Kimmel explicitly points out that Midas' golden touch actually makes him share the experiences of the poor he would not previously help. Midas exclaims 'What use is my wealth? It cannot buy me a cup of cold water or a crust of dry bread. Now I know what it means to be hungry, thirsty, frightened, and alone.' (p. 46). After the golden touch is taken away, Midas opens his palace to feed everyone and becomes a great benefactor due to his newfound empathy.

In this version, as in some ancient accounts, Medusa is turned into a gorgon as punishment for bragging about her beauty (also the case in Baldwin's 1895 Old Greek Stories and Reeves' 1969 Heroes and Monsters: Legends of Ancient Greece). This version, however, is almost mocking to Medusa for her vanity even at the moment of her death. Medusa asks if Perseus is afraid of being overcome by her beauty and this is why he will not look at her. Perseus makes fun of her in response, tells her to take a look at her own beauty and turns the mirror on her. Medusa screams that she was beautiful once and will be beautiful again, after which Perseus kills her.

* For further analysis see the survey entry on Enid Blyton's 1930 Tales of Ancient Greece and how the Midas retelling interacts with the Baucis and Philemon retelling to promote a particular view of social station.
