Summary

The movie presents the myth of the Argonauts in contemporary setting. It starts with an introduction about Tim Severin's expedition to Georgia in 1984 and then presents the director's version of the myth. The movie contains most of the main elements of the classical myth. It tells briefly the story of Jason and Pelias, describes the building of "Argo" (which looks exactly like Tim Severin's "Argo") and the assembling of the team. Then it presents adventures of the Argonauts on the sea (the island of the Bebrycians with king Amykos [Apol. Rhod., Argonautica, 2. 1-150], Lemnos presented as an island of the Amazons [Apol. Rhod., Argonautica, 1. 607-912], meeting a prophet Phineus transformed into a harpy [Apol. Rhod., Argonautica, 2. 178-533], meeting the sirens [Apol. Rhod., Argonautica, 4. 891-921]) and in Colchis. As the movie is a musical, every element is present as a short musical sketch, often with dances and comic elements.

This version of the myth eliminates drastic cruelty. There are predictions of future dangers in the plot, but all of them appear less ominous (except a rockfall in the mountains and a sea storm). The fight with Bebrycians is a jam-session held by Heracles and Amykos. The "sacred" Golden Fleece turns out to be a parchment with Georgian wisdom given to Jason as Medea's dowry. Jason and Medea fall in love and Aeëtes blesses them. Jason has to harness a bull, plow a field, wait for the harvest (grapes that grow on the field sown by Jason!), but there are no dragon's teeth, no army, and, even, no dragon. These elements of the myth are implied to be a nightmare of young men drunk on Georgian wine.

There are also some elements added to the myth. For example, before the journey Jason goes for advice to a Greek philosopher Diogenes. On the first island, where the Argonauts land, they meet young boys on the shore, who want the heroes to move them to laughter, which is a typical motive in Georgian folklore. One of the Argonauts is Shalom, a Georgian returning home. In Colchis Jason participates in a contest of suitors for Medea and wins her favour.

Analysis

In 1984, the expedition of Tim Severin reconstructing the voyage of Jason reached the shores of Soviet Georgia. The movie declares itself to be also a research exercise aiming to explore "why the Argonauts sailed to the edge of the world, as it seemed then". The film presents the myth from the point of view of modern young men and their desire to have fun and adventures. The Argonauts look like young men on vacations, whose problems disappear the next morning. The movie is full of cheerful songs and creates a light, joyful atmosphere.

The plot of myth differs from the ancient versions. For example, contrary to the Argonautica, it is Heracles who becomes infatuated with the queen of Lemnos (called Lydia in this case). His song of love to her reconciles women and men. Jason even tries to leave Heracles at the island to continue the travel. But the Argonauts return for him and proceed with the journey together. Thus, contrary to the Apollonius Rhodius' version, Jason is not falling in love, nor abandoning pregnant Hypsipyle. Love of Heracles is true and faithful, he leaves the island taken by force by his friends. Thus, this version of the myth does not anticipate future infidelity of Jason to Medea.*

Colchis is depicted as the contemporary Georgia, famous for its hospitality, songs and food. Shalom, a Georgian member of the crew, tries (unsuccessfully) to convince his friends to bring peace to the country and forget about the Fleece. We see crowds of Georgians meeting the tourists with open arms. Even the Greek Argonauts speak with a Georgian accent and sing Georgian songs.

Medea is a kind, chaste young woman, versed in popular wisdom and fairytales of the country. As Shalom states: "not a witch, but a fairy [...], a saint, she even brings dead people to life sometimes." She is a smiling young lady with long hair, dressed in a hippie style long robe.

Jason is shown as a king's son longing for power and a hero yearning for great deeds. However his words sound childish and unconvincing.

Aeëtes is a father giving his very young daughter into marriage, however, contrary to ancient representations of the myth, in the movie the king trusts his daughter and approves of her choice, there is no fight between Aeëtes and Jason. Aeëtes blesses his daughter and the Argonauts for their journey home and gives the parchment (the fleece) to the Greeks, however he misses his child.

The movie finishes on the return of the ship to the shores of departure showing cameramen, the crew and the actors in modern clothes. "Finish, finish the filming" are the last words of the movie.
