Additional information

Summary

The movie tells the story of Icarus who lives among the sages. "All his neighbours, clever men, have already found their place in life and dedicated their leisure to philosophical conversations. [...] And this one was... an eccentric." During the movie Icarus tries to fly many times and falls watched by the eyes of the clever men, who tell him Latin proverbs. These "unquestionable truths" written on monuments tumble on fallen Icarus from heaven. Nevertheless Icarus tries again using new contraptions.

At some point a miracle happens and Icarus flies (colour is added to the movie, and calm music changes into a solemn one). But the proverb ("Bene qui stat non moveatur") finds him in the sky and makes him fall. First, the letters of the proverb are written on clouds (on black clouds), they gather in one huge dark mass squeezing Icarus between them. Afterwards the cloud is transformed into a black monument inscribed with the proverb; the monument falls burying Icarus beneath.

Schoolchildren with teachers come to the monument and recite proverbs in Latin. But among the pupils there is one curious boy who looks at the sky and around, and who, after finding Icarus's feathers, makes his own wings. The boy attempts to fly; in the background we hear Icarus' flight theme.

Analysis

The movie is based on the contradiction of scholastic dogmatic knowledge and curiosity. It may be interpreted as a metaphor of school and growing up, and in a broader sense as a symbol of life with open eyes and courage. Although Soviet authorities during the whole history of the regime wanted to educate and discipline students, at the same time, pathos of discoveries and fearlessness were always present in the educational discourse. It is hard to say whether it was a cartoon addressed to some real situation or whether the movie aimed to invoke a spirit of freedom and enlightenment. In any case the atmosphere of the movie invites the viewer to become Icarus and not to be afraid of falling.

In a late interview, Fëdor Khitruk said that he regretted adding a happy ending to the movie. He would have preferred to finish with the black monument standing where Icarus fell. He said that he did not have enough courage to promote this ending.*
