Additional information

Summary

The story begins with a poetic prologue where Prometheus briefly gives answers to some questions and tells his story: "While the audience is getting into the mood for the performance, while the lights are fading out and the tableau curtains are being slowly drawn apart (this time they are drawn apart all too slowly), the dialogue starts, a question followed by the answer. The questions are asked by our time, by our contemporaries, by ourselves; they come from somewhere near, this side of the ramp. The answers are given by the past and they come from somewhere out there, from upstage". After that the action is transferred to the forge of Hephaestus, where Prometheus tells his friend how difficult it is to live on earth and how people suffer after the mighty tyrant Zeus left them with no fire. Friends vow to each other with the strongest oath ("the sacred river") that they "will do everything to give fire to people and will continue to faithfully and eternally act in name of big deeds." Zeus decides to bring Hephaestus back to Olympus and first sends Hermes to him, followed by Dionysus with nectar and ambrosia and by Aphrodite. Hephaestus is tempted, he gets access to the Olympic hearth and immediately shares fire with his friend Prometheus, who decided to live among poor mortal people. Prometheus brings fire to people. Zeus becomes furious, he orders his new servant Hephaestus to chain his friend to the rock and pierce his belly with a cane every day. ("Later on, people's imagination will create an eagle that flies daily to the rock to peck Prometheus' liver. People love such beautiful sentimental stories, but there was no eagle in reality.") Prometheus takes all the blame, and Hephaestus chains his friend to the rock, defeated by the will of Zeus.

Analysis

The play presents a simplified version of the myth about Prometheus with a special attention to the conflict between authority and personality. The image of Prometheus is influenced by the rules of socialist realism (although the play doesn't belong to that period: he accomplishes a heroic deed in the name of human happiness. However, the author isn't focused on Prometheus. Hephaestus instead draws his attention. The rejected god faces a choice between friendship and blessings of Olympus that come along with subordination to the supreme power. The play clearly, though not directly, condemns the choice of Hephaestus who obeyed the tyranny of Zeus because of his love to the people.

The world of mythological characters is supposed to be a representative combination of heroic and romantic features, but the characters' histories are modified for a greater probability of conflict between them (the main characters can be represented as general ideas). So Zeus is a pretentious, uncaring tyrant, Apollo is mentioned to be the ex-lover of Aphrodite, and Hephaestus is ordered to pierce Prometheus' body, which should sharpen the conflict of the play. Combining these generalized features of classical characters the author wants to talk with the younger audience about "true friendship" in difficult circumstance. The details add to creating the plausibility effect, e.g. Prometheus uses a piece of ferula to transport the fire. Poetic fragments in the text refer to choral traditions of ancient dramas, although the metrical foot does not correspond to traditions. One can distinguish a prologue with a short description of further events; parodos, which briefly describes the history of Hephaestus and creates the right sublime mood, and exodus with the departure of the main characters and the final words by Prometheus. The structure of society in the play reflects the model of the world that the young audience is supposed to fight against by using their friendship, courage, and selflessness. We could say, that the play didactically embodies the ideology of the times – late Soviet period with its particular attention to the new generation and its upbringing.
