Summary	Based on the novel of the same name, Homecoming tells the story of four siblings – Dicey, James, Maybeth and Sammy Tillerman– who are abandoned by their mother. (Their father had already abandoned the family some years before.) Led by the eldest, Dicey, the children make their way mostly on foot down the east coast of the United States. At their lowest ebb, they meet a student called Windy who drives them to the home of their cousin Eunice. Eunice is willing to take Dicey and Maybeth in but starts to make arrangements for the boys to be fostered elsewhere. Determined to stay together, the children run away from Eunice's house and take a bus to Crisfield, Maryland, where their reclusive grandmother lives. The children must convince their grandmother, Abigail, that she should let them live with her on her farm, but she refuses the responsibility. The film ends with Abigail taking children to the bus stop to return to Eunice's house. The bus pulls away to reveal that the children are still with Abigail, who then introduces them as her grandchildren for the first time, to a local storekeeper. On the boat journey back to the farm, Abigail asks Dicey, "Ready to go home?" and Dicey replies, "Ready."

Analysis

Homecoming is a heartwarming depiction of family bonds and determination. While it is relatively faithful to the novel, with some dialogue reproduced verbatim, the film is more sentimental, perhaps reflecting its more general target audience. For example, the appearance of the children on-screen emphasises their tender years more than in the novel, where they are presented as competent survivors. Frequent close-up shots of Dicey are used to amplify her helplessness, isolation and responsibility for the younger siblings, who are often framed as a group of three in contrast to Dicey. This shifts once Abigail takes on the role of responsible adult, with the children framed as a group of four in the final scenes. Shots of loving parents and children are used throughout the film to provide a contrast with the abandoned Tillermans.

Classical references in this adaptation are less obvious than in its source material. Voigt's novel has been compared to Homer's Odyssey, with Dicey filling the role of Odysseus and other characters filling other roles in the story (see Henke 1985, 48-51). In the film, the children reach Abigail's hometown 35 minutes in, meaning that both the sense of an epic journey and some of the classical allusions have been lost. Those that remain are:

- Dicey's encounter with the security guard (Polyphemus)
- Windy, the student who helps the children find Eunice's house (Aeolus)
- The children's stay at Eunice's house (formerly Aunt Cilla's house and thus interpreted as a stand-in for Scylla), although their stay seems to have been truncated to one night.
- The circus (Circe in Henke's analysis) appears in the script but not the finished film.

The majority of the film's running time is devoted to the children's arrival at Abigail's home and subsequent battle of wills to persuade their grandmother that they should be allowed to live with her. In both the novel and film, these scenes can be interpreted as representing Odysseus's homecoming and trials to prove himself to Penelope.

Rather than focusing on the journey itself, the film's emphasis is on the difficulties of relationship-building and the right to a safe home.
