Summary

According to the Prologue, in Admission, "it took slightly under eight hours for Melbourne to die." Pandora Jones awakens in an infirmary with hazy recollections of how she came to be there. She has horrific visions and dreams of her family and everyone else around her dying. The "Doctor" informs her that she is one of the lucky survivors of a pandemic that has almost wiped out humanity. There are only a few surviving "arks" left around the world and she is in one of them, they have limited food and other resources. The "ark" turns out to be "The School" which is a quarantined facility cut off from the world by water and high walls, the students are told that beyond the walls there is EVIL. As soon as Pandora is well enough to leave the infirmary, she is placed with a group of other students who are new to "The School". They are given a class timetable and told that they have free time to work on their own individual gifts. Pandora's individual gift is intuition: she is good at finding things. The other children laugh at her gift, but after she finds a watch that was hidden by one of the students, she gets a strange summons by the doctor of the infirmary. He wants to work with her on developing her gift, so she starts visiting the infirmary while the "Doctor" tests her. All the students deny having told the doctor about the watch being found by Pandora. This and other goings-on make Pandora suspicious of "The School," so she and her friend, Nate, decide to scale the walls one night. Only they are captured, drugged and returned to "The School" as soon as they get over the wall. Trying to piece together what is going on through fragments of memories, nightmares and conversations with other students only makes Pandora more suspicious. Another student, Cara, mysteriously goes missing so Pandora is asked if she can use her gift to find her. She tries clearing her head to concentrate and finds that her gift has transformed. She is now able to channel birds, and using this ability she flies over "The School" and locates the missing student high on a mountain. When the teacher and the students climb up to her they find that she is dead. It is a mystery how she managed to climb the mountain in the dark with no climbing equipment and why she sat in the cold to die. The next night Pandora and her group are awoken and taken out on a boat to dispose of the body. Then they are told that they have a mission in which there have been sightings of other possible survivors and they are being dropped off to explore, locate and rescue. They have exactly seventy hours for their mission and then the boat will return. If they miss the boat they will be left behind. Pandora has a premonition that one student will be left behind. They do locate survivors but the survivors spend the next seventy-two hours trying to kill them. Pandora and all but one student make it back to the boat, after killing two of the people trying to kill them. Nate is killed and left on the island. On the boat ride back, Pandora is even more convinced that "The School" is a big lie.

Analysis

Admission is the first book in the Pandora Jones Trilogy in which Barry Jonsberg uses classical myth to explore the adolescent condition. The main protagonist Pandora, who is also called Pan for short, awakens in a post-pandemic world to find herself in "The School" which is walled off from the rest of the world. Admission uses ideas of Pandora's curiosity about "The School" to propel the narrative along. Classical mythology is directly referred to in the book. On asking her name the "Doctor" comments, "Pandora—a classical name. The bringer of mischief into the world. I only hope you don't bring much mischief into this world. Can I call you Pan for short?" Pan later replies, "Hope. Pandora brought mischief, and evil into the world but she also brought hope." These qualities define Pandora throughout the book. Pandora seeks ways to try to find out what is happening at "The School" and to work out who she can trust; however, in the face of dreams and memories, she is finding more and more to distrust. Pandora is also representative of Cassandra known for her prophetic gifts, Pandora's psychic gift develops throughout the book as she begins to have premonitions into the future as well as being able to find things in the past. The world around "The School" is unknown, apart from the early reference to Melbourne and two of the other eight students coming from Australia, there is no way of knowing where "The School" is situated geographically. It is just situated in a vague dystopic future which adds to the mystery while Pandora comes to terms with the past and its relation to the present and how she came to be in "The School." In Admission, therefore, classical myth intersects with ideas of female power, knowledge, identity and self-discovery, all key elements of young adult fiction, which sit within the dystopian novel.
