Kanstantsin Veranitsyn , 1834 - 1904 (Author)

Kanstantsin Veranitsyn (Vasil'eu; Канстанцін Вераніцын, Васільеў) was born in Astraŭliany village (Vitsebsk region, Belarus) into a family of serf peasants, who were owned by the landlord Vasil' Bondaraŭ. At the age of eleven Kanstantsin received freedom and acquired his surname Veranitsyn. It is quite possible, that Kanstantsin Veranitsyn was an illegitimate son of his landlord. He went to the parish school of Haradok, Vitsebsk provincial gymnasium (1845–1852) and studied at St. Petersburg Medical and Surgical Academy (1852–1854). In 1854 Veranitsyn was expelled from the Academy, but in 1859 he graduated from Horki Agricultural Institute with his final work "On the Belarusian economy". In 1863-1874 he lived and worked in St. Petersburg, in 1874-1879 he worked as a teacher at Maladzechna Teachers' Seminary. Since 1880 he worked for the Ministry of Railways in St. Petersburg in the rank of state councilor. The exact date of his death is unknown. Except Taras on Parnassus, there is only one poem (The two devils) that is thought to have been written by Kanstantsin Veranitsyn.

Summary

After a long usual journey through the forest, Taras, the forester, the main protagonist and narrator of the poem, falls into a pit and finds himself on at the base of Mount Parnassus. A little Cupid ("curly-headed, like a sheep" with a quiver of arrows and a hefty bow) guides him to the top. Taras passes a large group of writers climbing the mountain (he notices that not everyone is allowed to enter) and finally gets to the top where he realizes that he is surrounded by Greek gods who live and behave just like Belarusian peasants. They work hard and do their housekeeping. We see Zeus, Saturn, Jupiter, Neptune, Mars, Bacchus, Cupid, Hebe, Vesta, Venus, Hercules, Nymphs, Naiads, Zephyrus. All of them have their duties according to their function in Greek mythology and to traditional folk household chores and everyday activities: Saturn makes new bast shoes, Neptune mends fishnets, Zeus lies on the warm stove-top watching Mars fight with Hercules, goddesses do the laundry and Venus spends her time near the mirror. Parnassus gods have their feasts with folk dances, they eat national Belarusian dishes and drink harelka (vodka). Taras joins the party (he is keen on music), gets a complement for his dancing skills from Jupiter, gets some food from Hebe and decides to go back home. Zephyrus helps him to get back to his forest.

The poem has a narrative frame (a foreword and an afterword), in which the author acknowledges that he has written down this story straight from Taras, who is "a quiet fellow, / no liquor ever touched his lips". From this point Taras on Parnassus is a story within a story used to parody the image of an ordinary peasant, his values and way of thinking.

Analysis

Taras on Parnassus is one of the most important works of 19th-century Belarusian literature. This poem became the fundamental text of the national literary tradition for many generations of scholars and readers. It is also one of the most mysterious texts because of its long way to proper authorship attribution, date and place of origin, publication, further copies, changes and comments. In the poem, the ancient gods are transferred to the 19th century, so we can see how different epochs and different cultures meet and unite. Kanstantsin Veranitsyn found a way to combine the truth of life and classical mythology. Mythological figures in Taras on Parnassus are presented in grotesque and burlesque terms. By caricaturing the manner and spirit of classical characters, the author exposes the false interest in folk culture, which official literature used to demonstrate at the end of the 19th century.

The reception of Parnassus in the poem corresponds with the general concept of God's mountain and shows traits of two sacred mountains, Olympus and Parnassus. Taras' ascension to the top of "the home of the Muses" symbolizes an ascent (or the possibility of an ascent) of Belarusian literature to the height of world classical culture. The presence of a simple forester on top of Parnassus proves the right of ordinary people to have their own literature, this is how the change of literature's main recipient is revealed.

Many copies of Taras on Parnassus were published with a special mythological dictionary which included short definitions of classical characters mentioned in the poem. By means of this dictionary and by the use of iambic tetrameter (classical meter in Slavic poetry, associated with Pushkin's light and simple verse forms, which is especially important because Veranitsyn allows Pushkin, Lermontov and Zhukovskii to enter Parnassus in his poem) the poem performs its educational function. It also describes basic Olympian characters and gives an opportunity to talk about classical Russian literature, comparing it with Belarusian literature. The poem also introduces the concept of irony, grotesque and satire as a genre.
