Summary

The novel opens with the narrator's encounter with Akara-ogun, the great hunter of the village. Worried that he may die at any moment and that the world might forget him, the hunter asks the narrator to pick up his pen and write down his hunting story. He opens up by talking about his immediate family and his name, Akara-ogun (Compound-of-Spells). Because he has wronged God by getting married to a witch, a spirit is sent to kill him but it spares him and asks him to kill his witch wife. Not up to a month after he kills her, his parents also die. Akara-ogun becomes a hunter like his father and decides to go hunting in the Forest of a Thousand Daemons, home of every vicious beast on earth.

In the forest, he meets a set of ghommids that decide to use him for their meal, but thanks to "Egbe", a spirit that helps him, he disappears and finds himself home. His adventures are disrupted by several spirits and monsters: he combats Agbako, the sixteen eye monster; he is tempted by a beautiful Helpmeet, a beautiful woman who appears, presents herself and takes Akara-ogun with her, making him understand that he is special in the eyes of his Creator and he still has a lot to accomplish for his creator. He meets Iwapele who tells him that the name of the city where he is Filth, a place of suffering and contempt.

After saying this, Akara-ogun gets up and bids goodnight to the narrator, promising to come the following day to continue the story. After his departure, the narrator gathers a cross section of his neighbors and narrates the old man's tale to them. The following morning the narrator's home is full of patient listeners. He continues the story with his visit to Irunmale, Forest of A Thousand Daemons, where he sees an antelope, shoots it and the animal goes into a cave. He follows to get it only to discover that he has been trapped by a large posterior with eyes six times the normal size. The creature uses him like a horse; mounting him and making him carry it about. However, the hunter with his cunning style, tricks the monster, and kills it. Lost in the forest, he meets ghommids that are different from the ones he had seen all through his wandering in the forest. They look much like humans and their settlement is well organized with a king, whom the hunter saves from plots against him. His saving of the king makes the people detest him, bury him up to his neck, shave him, and apply honey to his head, inviting all sorts of insects. However, he struggles and liberates himself when it rains and the earth is soft.

Thinking about his miserable state on earth, he starts lamenting but his Creator sends an exquisitely beautiful lady who takes him to her home and asks her maids to "bathe him with warm water and rub him with sweet-smelling unguents". The beautiful lady dies immediately alongside her servants after helping the hunter. Feeling frustrated, he cries and calls for his mother who had gone forth to the land of the dead. She appears from beneath the earth, takes him along through a path to a tunnel where she gives him a white stone. She asks him to cast it into the tunnel, then follow it. This he does and it takes him through the tunnel where he meets Lamorin, a long-time missing hunter. They recognize each other from way back and soon became fond of each other and are inseparable. The hunter helps a ghommid to transform into a woman, decides to marry her and Lamorin officiates their marriage. Unfortunately for them, Lamorin dies in the hands of Tembelekun, a monster. Later, his wife leaves him for she cannot live in the presence of other humans. This breaks his heart and he parks to his uncle's village where he settles and gets married to many wives. At this point, the sun goes down and the old hunter leaves for his home, promising to come back to complete whatever is left of the tale. The following day, upon arrival, Akara-ogun exchanges some words of wisdom with the assistants, making them understand the Greatness of God, man's inability to see the future, and God's supremacy over man and other creatures. On this note, he goes to finish his story.

In his new habitat, he is summoned by the king, who puts him at the head of a team. He will be sent on a mission in quest of a precious thing he knows nothing about, which is found in Mount Langbodo, a kingdom found deep at the end of a forest thicker and denser than The Forest of a Thousand Daemons. In fact, this forest begins at the very end of the Forest of a Thousand Daemons. It is pregnant with more deadly creatures, superior in number and in ferocity to the Forest of a Thousand Daemons. After a careful selection and scrutiny, a team of seasoned hunters is put in place. This team consists of Kako, Imodoye, Elegbede-Ode, Efoiye, Aramada-Okunrin and great Akara-ogun himself. Their object of quest is something that will flourish in the land. After so much toiling in pain and battles, they registered successes, thanks to the timely intervention of a number of people and creatures Akara-ogun met during his earlier trips in the Forest of a Thousand Daemons. They finally get to Mount Langbodo, the kingdom of God. Here, they are received, fed, and draped, then brought in the presence of God, in front of whom they prostrate as a show of respect and recognition for his greatness. He, in return, welcomes and tells them to go to Iragbeje where, for over seven days in the house of seven wings, he edifies them on some virtues that every human should adopt: child upbringing and education, and worship and Glorification of God. When they return, they discover that a day spent in heaven was more than a year on earth. The narrator ends his story by reminding each reader to always remember that life is full of ups and downs, but it is not because things get rough that we should forget God and his immense love for us. We should give thanks in all situations. We should behave like men, and remember that "God in His Highness helps those who help themselves".

Analysis

Fagunwa uses motifs from his traditional Yoruba folktales but textures them together into a lengthier narrative structure that parallel epic proportions. Just like in ancient Greek epics, Fagunwa's narration is about a hero who sets out on a mission that is ultimately accomplished with great audacity, cunning, fluke, and help from God. More so, following the epic tradition, Fagunwa sets his story in strange settings like in middle of the forest, bush that has spirits and remarkable creatures who hover around any traveller, brave enough to trespass on their terrain. The narration is mainly from the third-person narrative, interspersed with dialogue and the first person point of view, as it is in Homer's Odyssey (especially books 9-12). In Homer's Odyssey, there is a shift between narrative passages and direct speech just like Fagunwa's whose character, the hunter decides to tell a story, stop to give council and comments on his adventures. The Greek epic and the Forest of a Thousand Daemons share common features as they present tones that are nostalgic and celebratory, from a sombre tone to a joyous and exciting one at the end of the heroes' quests. Notably, both Fagunwa, and Homer, uses flashback as the main narrative device to reminiscence about the hero's past quests. Both authors present the strength of heroes' cunning natures, temptation; goals and obstacles, separation of friends and family and maturation in journeys.

Apart from reflecting Homer's Odyssey, Fagunwa's Forest of a Thousand Daemons replicates The Epic of Gilgamesh. In the poem, Gilgamesh, the king, embarks on a journey to learn the secret of eternal life, just as the hunter does in Fagunwa's tale. Conversely, the hunter's journey parallels that of Gilgamesh. In his journey he meets weird creatures, such as scorpion men and stone hulks, and goes to strange places such as the jewel-encrusted Garden of the Gods. Lastly, in Fagunwa's tale, the hunter is assisted by divine intervention, just like Gilgamesh and Odysseus are assisted by gods in times of need.
